10th International Conference on HIV Prevention

In May 2018, New Horizons hosted the 10th Annual International Conference on HIV Prevention in Amsterdam, Netherlands. Titled “The Power of Peer-Led HIV Services: Adolescent and Youth Leadership in the Era of the 90-90-90 Goals”, the conference aimed to highlight the voices of adolescent and youth peer leaders. The goal of the conference is to showcase successful peer-led initiatives and facilitate interactions between service providers, donors, and stakeholders.

The conference was attended by over 2,000 participants from around the world, including youth leaders, researchers, healthcare providers, and representatives from governmental and non-governmental organizations. The conference included several key sessions and workshops, including a session led by the National Association of State interest areas. The session focused on the importance of involving young people in the development and implementation of HIV prevention programs.

Additionally, the conference featured several posters and presentations on the latest research and developments in the field of HIV prevention. These included a poster on the successes of the 90-90-90 goals in the United States, as well as a presentation on the role of peer leaders in achieving these goals.

Finally, the conference included a session on the future of HIV prevention, with a focus on the importance of incorporating new and emerging technologies into prevention strategies. The session highlighted the potential of tools such as mobile apps and social media to reach young people and increase awareness of HIV prevention strategies.
